The tapping at the door is so faint and tentative it's easy to pretend it's not happening. The words that follow are whispered just as softly, but too audibly to ignore. Mrs. Dana, good morning. It's after seven o'clock. The car is downstairs. Hello?

Brisk footfalls pad away. Dana has been dressed and ready to leave for more than an hour but is not yet prepared to face Marcella who begins flipping on light switches and emptying the dishwasher every morning at six-thirty. Marcella is an excellent cook and keeps the house in order, but it galls Dana how patronizing she can be, often speaking to her like she imagines someone addressing an
